Collision theory states that there needs to be enough energy to break the bonds between molecules and smash the electron clouds together. Why does increasing temperature speed up a chemical reaction? The energy of the collisions increase because the temperature raises the average kinetic energy of the particles.

Collision theory gizmo - Studylib

If a solution is made more concentrated it means there are more particles of reactant knocking about between the water molecules, which makes collisions between the important particles more likely. In a gas, increasing the pressure means the particles are more squashed up together so they are going to collide more frequently.
