First encounters: French literature and the cinematograph

In the first four decades of the twentieth century, French male novelists—not all of them “colons”—regularly wrote about the cultural influence of Southeast Asia on French colonials, whether they be businessmen, military personnel, or colonial civil servants. In their writings, the French man’s contact with natives (his colonial “other”) often leads to his adoption of Asian culture and repudiation of Western culture. In order to understand the complexities of this trend, it ...

Introduction. In the years 1704-1717 the French orientalist Antoine Galland published his translation of an Arabic collection of tales called the Thousand and one nights. It was the first translation of this work in a European language and it was an instant success: Galland's Mille et une nuit conquered the French audience and was soon translated into the main European languages.
